Why Your Portfolio Should Tell a Story 1. People Remember Stories, Not Facts Think of your portfolio as telling a story instead of a bunch of collected projects to be presented to clients. By telling a story you make the clients who are evaluating the portfolio identify and engage with your professional journey. Besides, stories are easy to remember while facts are forgettable. 2. A Story Connects the Dots A story connects disparate projects you have selected for your portfolio; projects which would otherwise leave the client feeling lost and disconnected. A narrative allows clients to see and understand why you selected beginnings of each project portfolio. Also, clients get to learn decisions and steps you took in order to successfully finish the projects. 3. A story reveals your personality By telling a story, the client gets to know you, see how you relate with others, and how handle different situations that might arise after they hire you for a project. In short, they get an insight into your thinking process.
